

Food costing for Nigerian kitchens

Know what every plate really costs.

Before market prices eat your profit. NairaPlate turns today's market prices, in mudu, derica and paint rubber, into the true cost of every dish and the price you should charge.

- ✓ Costs in 18 Nigerian market units
- ✓ A margin alarm when prices rise
- ✓ One PIN per staff member, each seeing only their part

THE PROBLEM

When the price of garri jumps, your margin disappears quietly.

The price of egusi, oil, garri, rice and meat can change from one purchase to the next. If those changes never reach the price of a dish, a kitchen keeps selling, keeps busy, and still loses money on some plates without knowing which.

HOW NAIRAPLATE WORKS

1

Log what you buy

Record each purchase at the price you actually paid, in the units you actually buy in: mudu, derica, paint rubber, basin, jerry can and more.

2

Build your recipes

Tell NairaPlate what goes into each dish and how many plates it makes. It converts market units and works out the cost of every plate.

3

Price with confidence

Pick the margin you want and NairaPlate shows the price to charge. When an ingredient rises more than 5%, it flags every dish that uses it.

A WORKED EXAMPLE

Eba & Egusi, 10 plates

These are the demo kitchen's market prices: garri at ₦1,292 per kg (a derica holds about 0.9 kg) and egusi at ₦3,727 per kg.

To keep a 35% margin, the price is the cost per plate divided by 0.65. Change your margin or your prices, and the answer updates straight away.

INGREDIENT	COST
2 derica garri (1.8 kg)	₦2,325.60
500 g egusi	₦1,863.50
Total for 10 plates	₦4,189.10
Cost per plate	₦418.91
Sell at, for a 35% margin	₦644.48

Buying: real prices in, real units

Log purchases in 18 Nigerian market units. Every purchase updates ingredient prices, so costs always use today's price.

Kitchen: the margin alarm

When an ingredient rises more than 5%, every dish using it is flagged for a pricing decision. Batches and wastage are logged too.

Selling: every naira reconciled

Cashier point of sale, cash drawer counts, delivery-app payout checks, and voids kept on record with a reason.

Oversight: owner-level truth

The owner sees the full profit and loss, a 7-day cashflow and an audit log that cannot be edited. Past sales keep their original cost.

ONE PIN EACH. EVERYONE SEES ONLY THEIR PART.

Staff sign in with a business code and their own PIN. No emails or passwords to remember, and a cashier never sees the owner's profits.
